

To Whom It May Concern:

I am very skeptical to the resolution plan after the fact of 9/11 of consolidating media and information distribution regulated by the FCC. My concern has been increased in frequency even more than a year ago when the majority of press (no matter the media) and marketing was focused upon one main premise and enforced by a few media conglomerates. Now, after the USA Act, which was only hinted upon by major syndicates of the media, after it was signed to law by President George W. Bush, on Friday, October 26th; my skepticism grows more. The American public deserves an objective report as to the status of the nation and the world and doing anything but, would prove the act unpatriotic. Our 1st Amendment declares freedom of the press, no matter how bias and concentrated it is, the FCC should not relieve regulations on consolidated press. The restrictions appear to be relaxed enough, and anything more would contribute to a slippery slope. The American public needs to remember, no matter how conditioned they may be to conditions at hand, it is there reaction or lack of action that will affect them in the future, not "the man".
